many emotions attenuate more rapidly than the significance of the considerations that gives rise to them as we accommodate ourselves to what happens grief often diminishes quickly even though the dead continue to matter to us anger often evaporates even though the injustice to which it responds remains undiminished nonetheless such accommodation seems acceptable it would be a mistake to be persistently grieving or to be relentlessly angry but how could it be acceptable if the reasons for grief and anger remain significant unlike grief and anger whose diminution is puzzling what seems puzzling in the case of love is its continuation in its self consciousness love is endless in loving someone we foresee no end to our love yet we know that love can end hearts are broken lovers betrayed and people grow apart does the self consciousness of love involve a mistake or can we reasonably think of our love as lasting on the temporality of emotions argues that whereas grief and anger reasonably diminish love can rationally be conceived as endless berislav marušić draws on contemporary theories of the emotions especially grief and love as well as recent accounts of reasons it puts forward an account of emotional self consciousness as at once embodied and rational and maintains that accommodation reveals an irreconcilable moment in our emotional life a moment that philosophical reflection ought not seek to resolve lest our emotions are conceived as too neat and philosophy as too comforting
